This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

BX
5133
S78

UC-NRLF
$B 159 746

NATIONAL THANKSGIVING

1872

ARTHUR P. STANLEY

DEAN OF WESTMINSTER

YC152692

10 — B

This Book was presented to the Athenæum
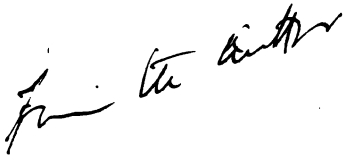
by The Very Rev.^d
The Dean of Westminster
on the 11.^th day of March 1872.



SERMONS

PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY

The proceeds will be devoted to the Fund for the Restoration of St. Paul's Cathedral.

THE

NATIONAL THANKSGIVING

Sermons

PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY

1. DEATH AND LIFE .....December 10, 1871
2. THE TRUMPET OF PATMOS.....December 17, 1871
3. THE DAY OF THANKSGIVING.....March 3, 1872

BY

ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, D.D.

DEAN OF WESTMINSTER

London

MACMILLAN AND CO.

1872

LONDON: PRINTED BY
SPOTTISWOODE AND CO., NEW-STREET SQUARE
AND PARLIAMENT STREET

SOLD BY ORDER OF THE COMMITTEE

BX5133
S78

PREFACE.

It has been thought desirable to leave on record some of the more permanent thoughts connected with the successive stages of the remarkable crisis through which our country has passed during the last three months. Many other discourses may have expressed more directly the individual feelings of the preacher. In a large, mixed congregation, like that assembled in Westminster Abbey, it seemed more fitting to speak of the general topics which would remain after the immediate occasion had passed, but which from this occasion derived a force that could not otherwise have been attained. A discourse like that delivered by the Bishop of St.

David's on 'Christian Loyalty'* is an example of this use of the events of the time. It is hoped that these sermons may, under other aspects, recall, at least in some degree, the serious reflections which, if the nation is true to itself, ought not to perish with the moment.

* Christian Loyalty. A Sermon preached at St. Peter's, Carmarthen, on Sunday, January 21, 1872, by Connop Thirlwall, D.D., Bishop of St. David's.

CONTENTS.

SERMON		PAGE
I.	DEATH AND LIFE	1
II.	THE TRUMPET OF PATMOS . . .	19
III.	THE DAY OF THANKSGIVING . .	41

I.

DEATH AND LIFE.

PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY,

DECEMBER 10, 1871.

SERMON I.

PHIL. i. 21.

'To live is Christ, and to die is gain.'

ON a day like this—when there is one topic in every household, one question on every lip—it is impossible to stand in this place and not endeavour to give some expression to that of which every heart is full. By a natural Christian instinct, the whole nation is gathered into one focus. We all press, as it were, round one darkened chamber, we all feel that with the mourning family, mother, wife, brothers, sisters, who are there assembled, we are indeed one. The thrill of their fears or hopes passes through and through the differences of rank and station; we feel that, whilst they represent the whole people, they also represent and are that which each family, and each member of each family, is separately. In the fierce battle between Life and Death, for the issues of which we are all looking with such eager expectation, we see the likeness of what will befall every individual soul amongst us; and the reflection which this struggle, with all its manifold uncertainties, suggests, concerns us all alike.

I have thought, therefore, that it is best to fix our minds for a few moments on what that struggle involves—to ask what are the true lessons of Life and of Death; to ask why it is that, whether as men, or citizens, or Christians, we desire with such prolonged earnestness that Life, and not Death, may be the issue of this mortal agony.

In doing so, let us be guided by the words of St. Paul. He is writing to his best-beloved converts. He opens his heart more fully to them than to any others. He admits them, as though they were his own brothers and friends, to his innermost chamber. He discloses to them his doubts, his anxieties, his weaknesses. He describes to them the danger in which he is—danger, we know not whether of natural sickness or of a violent end. He looks on Death and he looks on Life, and he knows not which to choose; he sees the good of each. At last he decides that what might have seemed the best for him is not really the best; that what might have seemed the worst for him is not really the worst. He tells us, in short, what are the reasons for desiring Death; but he tells us still more strongly what are the reasons for desiring Life.

It may seem almost cold thus to balance and weigh the searchings of the heart at such moments. Yet it was not coldness in the Apostle; it was the depth of tenderness. It is not coldness in us; it is the only channel into which we can profitably turn our thoughts on such an occasion, and make it yield its proper lesson.

I have, before this, in quite another connection, used these words of the Apostle. I know not how to do better than to use them again today, sharpened and pointed as they are by the feelings of the moment, even to 'the dividing 'asunder of soul and spirit, and discerning even 'the thoughts and intents' of our innermost hearts.

To die is gain. Who is there that has not from time to time felt this, as he looks at the sufferings of this mortal life; as he thinks of the wearing nights and days of sickness, of the restlessness, the sinking, the pain, the despair, the distress of the watchers, the prolonged agony of the bystanders; as he looks at the miseries of this sinful world—the disappointments of brilliant hopes, the sore temptations to evil, the multiplied chances of failure? Who, as he thus thinks of himself or of others, has not been moved to say, from time to time, 'Oh that I had the wings of a dove, that I 'might flee far away and be at rest!' It is the feeling beautifully expressed by the greatest of our poets, when he says:—

Tired with all these, for restful death I cry,—
As, to behold desert, a beggar born,
And needy nothing trimm'd in jollity,
And purest faith unhappily forsworn,
And gilded honour shamefully misplaced,
And right perfection wrongfully disgraced,
And art made tongue-tied by authority,

And folly, doctor like, controlling skill,
And simple truth, miscall'd simplicity,
And captive Good attending Captain Ill:
Tired with all these, from these would I be gone.

So wrote Shakspeare in his famous sonnet, and so felt even the great Apostle when, amidst the desertion of friends, and the hard struggle of truth against falsehood and good against evil, he desired to be at rest and be with his Master beyond the grave, which, he says, 'would be far better.'

So, too, we for ourselves, and for those that we love, and for those whose lives are fraught with so many chances of fatal shipwreck, may well long for that day when we and they shall have shuffled off this mortal coil; when we shall have done with the anxious trials, the paltry quarrels, the baffled hopes, the grinding toil of the great Babylon of this harassing world; when we shall have escaped from the burden and heat of the day, from the roar and tumult of the swollen torrent of life, to be with those beloved departed,

Who in the mountain grots of Eden lie,
And hear the fourfold river as it murmurs by.

In this sense Death is, and must be, a gain to all. And it is by reflecting on this clear gain that the mind bows itself to the Supreme Will, and the heart nerves itself to the terrible thought of the last dread summons from all that we see and love in this earthly scene. It is for this that, in the language of our Visitation Service, we commit the soul with such assured confidence into the hands of its faithful Creator and most merciful Saviour.

But the Apostle tells us that after all there is something yet greater than the gain and rest of Death, and that is the struggle and victory of Life. Death was gain to him, but Life was something more. 'To live is CHRIST.' Death in one sense is the gate of Life eternal; but Life—this mortal life—is the only true gate of a happy and peaceful death. It is in Life—in the wear and tear of Life—that those graces must be wrought and fashioned which perfect the soul, immortal over Death. 'Reckon yourselves,' says the Apostle, 'to be 'dead to sin.' But there is something much more than this, 'Reckon yourselves to be alive 'to God through Christ.' He preaches with all his heart and soul, not the worthlessness, but the infinite preciousness of Life.

Those lines from our great poet, which I quoted just now, describing his weariness of the world, close with the one thought which reconciled him to remaining :—

> Tired with all these, from these would I be gone,
> Save that, to die, I leave my love alone.

That, doubtless, is one chief thought that makes earthly life dear to us—the thought that it contains those whom our departure would leave desolate and alone. But in fact this sense of human love is a likeness, like all pure earthly affections, of a feeling far higher. When the heathen, when the unbeliever have often sought escape from the troubles of life by self-destruction, they have done so to escape from that which to them had no sacred value. But the Christian, the believer in God and in Christ, has, or ought to have, the abiding consciousness that in Life there are not only (it may be) the dearest objects of his earthly affection, but that there is the very work, the very presence of Christ. It is one of the points of coincidence between true Christianity and true civilisation. As mankind advances in civilisation, human life becomes more sacred, more precious; as mankind advances in Christianity, the human soul, which is but another word for human life, becomes more precious, more sacred also. By leaving our work here before the time, we should leave His work undone. By turning our backs in self-will or impatience on this mortal scene, we should be turning our backs on Him who is in those very sufferings and struggles most surely to be found.

Every kindness done to others in our daily walk, every attempt to make others happy, every prejudice overcome, every truth more clearly perceived, every difficulty subdued, every sin left behind, every temptation trampled under foot, every step forward in the cause of good, is a step nearer to the life of Christ, through which only death can be really a gain to us. Death may be great, but Life is greater still. Death may be a state to be desired for ourselves, rejoiced in for others, but Life is the state in which Christ makes Himself known to us, and through which we must make ourselves known to Him. He sanctified and glorified every stage of it. He was a little child, and showed us how good it was to be obedient to our parents—how dear to a mother a child could be—how He never forgot her, but even on the cross thought of what would soothe and comfort her. He grew up to boyhood—he showed us how to learn, both by hearing and asking questions—how early He could be busied in doing His Father's work. He showed us in full manhood how, in the midst of the world, and of constant pressing duties—many coming and going—in feasting and in company, no less than in serious moments, He still was the same Divine Master and Friend. He showed us in the desolation and solitude of Gethsemane and Calvary, when He seemed to be left, unsupported, to Himself, that He was yet not alone, because the Father was with Him. This is the way in which this poor human life may become a Divine life, may become a life of Christ.

Therefore, when we apply these words and thoughts to ourselves, what is it but to dwell not on the misuse, but on the use of our existence? Think how much yet remains to be done in the thirty, twenty—yes, even in the ten years, or perhaps in the one year, perhaps even in the one day, that yet may remain to us. Despise it not, neglect it not; cherish, enlarge, improve this vast, this inestimable gift, whilst it is granted to us with its endless opportunities, with its boundless capacities, with its glorious hopes, with its indispensable calls, with its immense results, with its rare chances of repentance, of improvement, even for the humblest and weakest among us.

To rise above ourselves, to lose ourselves in the thought of the work, great or small, that God has placed before us—to live in that life which is indeed eternal, because it belongs both to this world and the next—for the sake of doing this the Apostle could consent to live, could prefer life with all its sorrows to death with all its gain. 'God is not a God of the 'dead, but of the living.' Christ is not a dead Christ, but a living Christ. 'The living, the 'living, he shall praise Thee, he shall serve 'Thee.' The varied duties of common life—the daily round, the trivial task—are the means by which we carry on the true Apostolical succession of Christ's first servants. 'There may be 'everywhere'—I quote the words of a devoted Christian of another country—'there may be 'everywhere a silent apostleship, a persuasive 'and incessant sermon—namely, the natural 'brightness of a profound and true content. 'Never can the immortal hopes to which our de-'votion renders its sacrifice be so well proclaimed 'by our words, as by the radiant tranquillity of 'that inward repose which comes up from the 'heart to the countenance.' 'I find'—so said this same saint-like person—'I find Death perfectly 'desirable, but I find Life perfectly beautiful.'

And what is true of the life of individuals is true also of the life of great communities. There is, indeed, both of individuals and of nations, a life which is not a life, empty, dead, barren, a mere existence, vanity of vanities. But the collective life of thousands of English Christian souls—the life of the heart of a great people—life, not stagnation, life, not idleness—is the very element, the living element in which the spirit of man lives and makes others live—of which the Spirit of Christ, which is Christ Himself, is the life and the light. This is what is meant by saying that the Church—that is the Christian society, the living company of all good men, the souls and hearts of Christian men and women—forms 'the Body' of Christ. We, whether singly or collectively, are His representatives—we are (so the Bible repeatedly tells us) His very self. In all that is best and purest in us, in our duties, in our hopes, He lives. Because He lives we live. Because we live He lives. It is sometimes asked—it was asked the other day by an eloquent preacher in the great neighbouring Cathedral—whether the Christ, the Historical Person who lived eighteen hundred years ago, is still alive amongst us. It is also sometimes asked, in many forms, and with many forms of reply, how and where Christ's presence is to be found and felt. But the best answer to all these questions is the answer of the Apostle, 'To live is Christ.' It is so, as I have said, on the smallest scale in our individual existence. It is so on the largest scale. 'The Life of Chris-'tendom is the Life of Christ.' That is the proof, the evidence, the direct continuation of the life of Christ. It is through the multitudinous mass of living human hearts, of human acts and words of love and truth, that the CHRIST of the first century becomes the CHRIST of the nineteenth. Each successive age, each separate nation, does His work on a larger and still larger scale. The arts, the literature, the sciences, the charities, the liberties, the laws, the worship of the commonwealths of Christian Europe are all parts of the living body of CHRIST. Their influence on us is part of His influence.

Their benefits to us are part of 'the innumerable 'benefits of His Cross and Passion.' To live under the best influences of Christendom, to live under the best influences of Christian England, this for us, and this only, is—the Apostle allows us to say so—is CHRIST Himself.

And now, O my brethren, if there be an individual life to which much that I have already said be applicable—a life dear to hundreds of loving friends, and to a most loving family—a life which in their service and affection finds its best inspirations and its best vitality—a life which had till now (humanly speaking) long years of usefulness and happiness before it; then for the preservation of that life, for the sake of him who now lies on the dark confines of hope and fear, and for the sake of those most near and dear to him, we may and must earnestly pray and trust that it may by God's blessing be preserved. And when we add the further thought that this is a life which may, if so be, influence to an untold degree the national existence of which I just now spoke—a life which, if duly appreciated and fitly used, contains within it special opportunities of good such as no other existence in this great community possesses—a life which may, if worthily employed, stimulate all that is noble and beneficent, and discourage all that is low and base and frivolous—which, from its exceptional position, will have the power of moderating the extremes of party zeal, and of pursuing the common weal of all with an energy not weakened or divided by local or partial claims—a life which, if spared, may be the instrument for making us more and more to be of one mind and heart in all that is just and good, even as at this moment the fear of losing it has brought us all together with one heart and one soul. Such a life is worth living, is worth praying for, and for such a life, for such a Royal life—which is so dear now to those who watch its fluctuations from hour to hour beside and around the bed of sickness—which may, with God's blessing, be so precious for our children and our children's children—we pray that it may yet be prolonged for the good of men and the glory of God, through Jesus Christ, our Lord, who is 'the Resurrection and the Life, in whom whosoever believeth, though he were dead yet shall he live.'

II.

THE TRUMPET OF PATMOS.

PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY,

DECEMBER 17, 1871.

SERMON II.

REV. i. 10.

'I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet.'

THE new Calendar of Lessons, which has been followed for some months in this church, introduces for the first time in the Services of this Sunday portions from the Book of the Revelation of St. John. The history of the reception of that book in the Church is curious and instructive. For the first three centuries it was not regularly received amongst the Canonical Books of Scripture, and even after it was received—even at the time of the Reformation—very few lessons were selected from it to be read in public. The reasons for this are obvious. The Book is in fact exceedingly obscure—and it has been made even more obscure by the fancies of interpreters. It was also in ancient times looked upon askance, because it was the favourite text-book of those who were then thought heretics, and in modern times because it has been the favourite text-book of angry polemics and fanciful diviners of the future — the source whence have been drawn weapons of offence against theological adversaries, or imaginary pictures of the history of modern Europe. But in spite of these objections, it has, by the force of its sublime poetic form and its high moral tone, held its ground, and the true instinct of Christendom has been shown in the fact, that without the sanction of Councils and against the opinion of great prelates, this mysterious book has gradually forced its way into the Canon of Scripture, and now at last, after having been almost excluded from the public service of the English Church, it has been appointed to be read during the last month in the year, when its lessons naturally fall in with the season of Advent. Some chapters are still omitted, as fit rather for the solitary student than for the mixed congregation. But there is enough given to express the general tenor of the book, and it is of this general tenor that I propose to speak, and of this with its special application to ourselves.

The Prophet (for as such we must regard the author of this sacred book) was on the solitary island of Patmos, withdrawn from earthly things, like Moses on Sinai, or Elijah on Carmel. Round about him was the bright Ægean Sea, with its hundred isles and the neighbouring mountains of Asia Minor, within whose circle lay the familiar Seven Churches to which his epistles and addresses were sent.* And it was on the Lord's day. He was wrapt in the stillness and devotion of the day, already even in that early time set apart for the contemplation of heavenly things. Such was the external framework of the prophecy. It was in this solitude, in this solemn scene, from this lonely peak of speculation, that there was unrolled before the eye of his spirit that vision of the future which is called the 'Apocalypse,' that is the 'Revelation,' the 'Unveiling' of the will and purpose of Providence.

* See Appendix to Sermons in the East, pp. 225-231.

Amidst all that is obscure and difficult, there are two main features of this Revelation which may be easily described and easily understood. The first is that, as in all the prophetic visions of the Bible, the outward imagery is taken from the objects and circumstances immediately at hand and around. Not only do the bright sky, the wide sea, the lofty mountains, the grotesque rocks, the sandy beach, of Patmos and the adjacent islands enter into the picture, but the whole tissue of the visions themselves is drawn from the events with which the atmosphere of that portentous time was charged. It was the period which witnessed the fulfilment of those signs in earth and heaven which are set forth in the Gospel records brought before us at this season. The long peace which had prevailed throughout the world down to the death of the Emperor Nero had just been broken up. It was the epoch which the Roman historian describes as 'teeming with disasters, terrible in 'war, rent with faction, savage even in peace. From the Northern Ocean to the Ægean coasts, all was in confusion and alarm — wars and rumours of wars, earthquakes, volcanoes, armies marching and countermarching, the fall of Jerusalem, the burning of Rome, the overthrow of the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii, the barbarians hanging on the frontier, dynasty after dynasty succeeding each other on the imperial throne, 'the powers of heaven shaken, 'men's hearts failing them for fear of those 'things that were coming on the earth.' This was the horizon on which the Prophet looked out, and it was the thought of these calamities which presented to him the imagery of those prophecies which have themselves continued the like imagery for all such convulsions in every age. The 'thunderings and lightnings and 'earthquakes,' 'the trumpets of war' and 'the 'vials of wrath,' the overthrow of the Imperial city on her seven hills, the bottomless pit, and Death on his pale horse, all these are the signs which he read in the lowering heavens and the distracted earth of his own times. And on the other hand, the martyrs under the throne, the white-robed army of saints, the new Jerusalem coming down as a bride adorned for her husband, were suggested by the thought of the little band of Christians already spreading through the Empire, already becoming the centres of light and life and truth amidst a corrupt, decaying, and dissolving world; struggling against their fanatical persecutors in the Jewish Church, and their heathen persecutors in the Roman Empire, yet still holding their own, and containing within themselves the pledge of the future of civilisation and of Christianity. It is needless, it is futile to seek in these chapters for the detailed history of our own recent times. They have no relation to modern events; they belong, as far as their letter is concerned, to the States and the Churches which formed the horizon, far or near, of the Seer on the rock of Patmos, in the first century of the Christian era—not to the States and Churches of Italy, France, Germany, or

England, in the sixteenth, or eighteenth, or nineteenth, or twentieth centuries, as some in all succeeding generations have vainly tried to find them.

There is much in them that we shall never understand—they are riddles of which the key is lost; 'the times and the seasons that the 'Father has put in His own power,' and 'which 'are not known to the Angels of God, nor even 'to the Son of Man,' are not likely to be discovered by any process of interpretation, however ingenious, from this sacred book, which, as regards these outward things, was addressed to the generation not of some future age, but of that which its author was specially sent to waken and to warn.

But, secondly, there is an eternal truth wrapt up in these sublime visions—in their spirit, and not in their letter; in their general principles, not in their details. On that great Lord's day St. John was not in the flesh, not in the time or space of any particular scene or spot on earth, but 'in the Spirit.' And 'in the Spirit,' under these outward forms, he described how through struggles, through miseries and confusions of every kind, the cause of goodness and truth, the spiritual man (so to speak) of the whole human race advances towards perfection. From that solitary rock he saw the shaking of empires, the ruin of nations, the persecution of the saints, the blood of the martyrs; yet he felt persuaded, and in his bright and beaming words of hope and triumph, he has stamped on the mind of Christendom his persuasion, that purity and truth would come out victorious at last. It is at times a hard doctrine to receive. It seems at times as if the advance of civilisation, of religion, of goodness were so irregular that we almost despair of the ultimate purposes of Providence—of the final perfection of humanity. Yet the Seer of Patmos did not despair, nor was troubled beyond measure; and so, neither should our hearts fail.

In the voice of the trumpet that spoke behind him, however varied its tones, he recognised, and we should recognise, the voice of God. Even when, as then, the progress of humanity seemed to be thrown back, and ancient superstitions seemed to be regaining their hold, he clung, and we may still cling, to the hope that good will be wrought out of evil; even when we look on the grievous crimes and follies which have brought about the fall of nations, we may speak of them, as even in that hour of judgment St. John himself spoke of them, with a feeling of human sympathy for the wreck of imperial greatness and worldwide splendour.

These, then, are the two main features of the Apocalypse. First, the interest, which the public events of our own time are intended to awaken in the hearts of Christians. Secondly, the moral and spiritual effect which such an interest is intended to produce.

Other signs, other striking events, have occurred in the earlier part of this year on which I have before dwelt,* as like to those greater convulsions of which the Revelation speaks. But it seems to me that we shall be also following out the spirit of this sacred book, if we fix our attention on the one public event, close at hand, which has recently filled our minds; if we concentrate our thoughts on that one single trumpet-call, and ask what permanent good we may learn from it.

* I refer to sermons preached in the earlier part of 1871, during the troubles of France and the conflagration of Paris.

We were all of us engaged in our several pursuits; most of us as much withdrawn from any of the concerns which were going on outside of our own immediate circles as St. John was removed from all thoughts of the great Roman Empire in his seclusion in the isle of Patmos. Suddenly, like him, we everyone of us were roused from these separate individual cares; everyone, however high or however humble, in the midst of our several distractions and occupations, as though we heard the voice of a trumpet talking with us. It came not from falling thrones, or blood-stained battle-fields, or burning cities, but from a single sick chamber in a secluded English county. At each successive reverberation of that thrilling voice, as it was repeated from city to city in countless messages, it hushed the strife of angry disputants, it silenced the eager gathering, it broke up the festive banquet, it rang on from shore to shore through the vast range of the whole empire; the whole nation of Englishmen became on a sudden possessed with one thought and one desire. Even the remote subjects of our dominion, of other races and other creeds, joined in one united prayer for one single youthful life, that it might be sustained in its fierce struggle with death. And now that the tones of that trumpet are changed from mourning into joy, from despair into hope, not the less are its vibrations felt in every household and in every heart.

My brethren, there is not yet such absolute confidence as that we can indulge in assured thanksgiving for the answer to our hopes; and it is not till that day arrives that we can look forward, as we then ought to look forward, with solemn and serious thoughts to the fresh duties which the gracious mercy of God will then, if so be, impose both on him who is spared, and on us who have so earnestly trusted that he might be spared.

But we may, even now, before the recollection of our strain of eager expectation and anxiety has faded away, ask ourselves what this voice was intended to teach us; we may seek to give the reasons to ourselves and to other nations why our hearts have thus burned within us—why, by the mortal struggle of a single existence, our souls were so deeply stirred.

There were many feelings which this unexpected trumpet-call awakened in us, that made it like a voice from a better world.

Let me speak of a few of these. I confine myself to those which apply to all of us alike.

The first lesson of such a summons is that it called us out of ourselves. Nothing is so narrowing, contracting, hardening, as always to be moving in the same groove, with no thought beyond what we immediately see and hear close around us. Any shock which breaks this even course, anything which makes us think of other joys and sorrows besides our own, is of itself chastening, sanctifying, edifying. We are, or ought to be, the better for having had our souls filled with the thought of others, whom many of us never saw, with hopes and fears which went far beyond the small span of our own lives into the distant future.

Secondly, it touched a chord which vibrates even in the least responsive hearts. It appealed to our sense of the sanctity, the preciousness of family ties; it drew us round one family hearth. In every condition of life a natural instinct prompted an instantaneous sympathy with and for the sufferer and those who were watching around him, because in every household the same scene might at any moment be enacted. It made us feel, according to the trite saying, that royal persons are of the same flesh and blood with us; but it also made us feel—which is no less important—that we are of the same flesh and blood with them. That strain of suspense, that sorrow, that joy which we all of us have felt, was a testimony to the true nobleness and greatness of home affections. Let us, as we think over this week, thank God that He has planted these instincts within us. Let no one be ashamed to own, let everyone be eager to cherish, these pure and sacred feelings, which a whole nation has been proud to exhibit, and which are in fact the foundation of all true national and all true Christian life.

Thirdly, it has brought before us how, amidst all our dissensions and party strifes, we are still Englishmen—Englishmen, first and foremost, whatever we may be besides. This is not the first time that the like penetrating sympathy with a single member of the royal house has knit together the hearts of all. So it was, as our fathers have told us, when the Princess Charlotte was snatched away in a moment of time with her infant child. So it was on that sad day which, on its tenth anniversary in this past week, filled every mind with dark forebodings, when the illustrious Prince, whose loss is still felt throughout the Empire, was called away in the midst of his beneficent career. So it has been in that alternation of grief and hope which has wavered round the sick bed of the Heir of the remote future. This it is which gives to the Family that represents the whole people so rare, so singular an interest. It brings before us in a living, present shape the fact that above and beyond all sects and parties there is such a thing as an inextinguishable feeling towards our common country, a sacred bond in the thought that one familiar name calls up all our patriotic emotions, a charm which gilds the wear and tear of politics with a personal devotion, such as no mere abstraction could enkindle. I have often before and elsewhere dwelt on the sacredness of a Christian State, on the paramount supremacy of the English Crown and the English Law. It is impossible to imagine a more striking tribute than that which has been just rendered to this sometimes forgotten and disparaged truth, by the spontaneous outburst of every class and of every party. There are nations, and there have been times in which the devotion to the reigning family has been a thing separate and apart from the love of country. There have been times and places, where the love of country has existed with no loyal feeling to the reigning family. Let us thank God that in England it is not so. Loyalty with us is the personal, romantic side of Patriotism. Patriotism with us is the Christian, philosophic side of Loyalty. Long may the two flourish together, each supporting and sustaining the other.

And, finally, this universal movement has shown—what in the last resort Englishmen have always shown—that we are (I say it not in any spirit of boastfulness or ostentation) a Godfearing and religious people. What was the natural expression of our hopes and fears—our sympathy and the anxious expectation? It was the united sacred language of prayer to the Supreme Ruler and Father of the Universe. Not only in the churches in which, as here, day after day, the names of the Sovereign and her children are habitually mentioned, and where, in silent meditation, each of those names has through the whole of this long suspense been commended to God, not only in the solemn prayer which on last Sunday was offered up with one consent in every proud cathedral and humble village church which owns the Queen's authority, but in every church and chapel of every sect, however far removed from our mode of worship or doctrine; in temples of other faiths in regions far away; in journals at home, however cynical and worldly; in assemblies however secular, the same awful Name was invoked, the same devout wish was expressed, the same sacred petition breathed, differing in words, but in substance the same. This is indeed a true Christian communion; this is to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. We need not penetrate into the inscrutable secrets of Providence—we need not perplex ourselves with precise questions on the mode in which Prayer is answered. It is enough for us to know and feel that it is the most natural, the most powerful, the most elevated expression of our thoughts and wishes in all great emergencies. It is enough to know that in the most severe of all trials, the most sustaining and comforting thought is the fixed belief that we are in the hands of an All-wise, All-merciful Father. To Him we turned in anxious suspense, to Him we turn again with grateful thanks. Into His Hands we commended the spirit of the sufferer, hovering between life and death, to be strengthened, purified, and, if it might so be, restored to us. Into those same Hands of infinite compassion we commend once more that same youthful spirit, returning, as we trust, from the gates of the grave to a higher, better, grander life than ever before.

May we be strengthened by the voice of the heavenly Trumpet to fulfil more faithfully, more loyally, more courageously our duty towards him; may he be strengthened by that same voice, as from another world, to fulfil more actively, more steadfastly, more zealously his duty towards us. 'Unto God's gracious mercy and protection we 'commit him. The Lord bless him and keep 'him. The Lord make His face to shine upon 'him, and be gracious unto him.'

III.

THE

DAY OF THANKSGIVING.

PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY,

MARCH 3, 1872.

SERMON III.

PSALM cxxii. 1.

'I was glad when they said unto me, We will go into the house of the Lord.'

THESE words, taken from the Psalms of the 27th day of the month, which I have caused to be again repeated here to-day, met the eyes of thousands in the course of the past week, inscribed over the western portico of St. Paul's Cathedral. They fitly expressed the feeling which swayed the heart of the whole metropolis. We were glad, we rejoiced, because our Sovereign and her people had said, 'We will go into the house of the Lord.' It was a gladness which made itself felt even to the distant extremities of our mighty Empire. It was a gladness for the gracious gift, as if sent direct from heaven, of a precious life which we had earnestly sought. It was the gladness of beholding the Sovereign whom we loved once more trusting herself amongst us, and receiving with radiant smiles, with unshaken courage, the tokens of her people's loyalty. It was the thankful gladness, we may say, for the Thanksgiving itself, the grateful relief, that a day so long expected with such eagerness, we had well nigh said with such awe, as its morning dawned with its mighty burden of innumerable human souls, had come and gone amidst such almost unclouded brightness, such almost unbroken order and pure unstained enjoyment.

But it was not mere gladness—not mere thanksgiving. When we felt that the centre of all those myriad movements was not the seat of commerce, or legislation, or pleasure, but the consecrated house of the Lord—when we looked down on the multitudes covering that vast area, or upwards to the multitudes suspended in that soaring cupola—when after the long hours of waiting, there fell over all those dense masses a stillness, as of an unseen

Presence—when, as the voice of praise and prayer went up from thousands of lips and thousands of hearts, the whole atmosphere became, as it were, charged with worship—we felt assured that the ages of faith are not yet run out, that Religion, in its widest and deepest sense, still holds its sway over the hearts of Englishmen, that it shall be, as far as human foresight can reach, the crown and consummation and best expression of our noblest and purest feelings. And when further we remarked, how, under that spacious dome were gathered (with the single exception of one exclusive body), the representatives of every Christian, nay, of every religious community in England, how all of these felt that, agreeing here or disagreeing there, they yet on the whole could join in the utterances of religious faith and hope as embodied in the venerable forms of the National Church—it was a living proof that such united worship within one common national sanctuary is not an idle dream; it was a sign that a National Church, so bound up, heart and soul, life and limb, with the Nation and the State, could alone furnish such a common meeting-point of religion and patriotism—it was a pledge that as long as the memory of that day remains, England will not willingly consent to make over her noblest historical and sacred edifices, her purest and highest aspirations after God, to the keeping of any single sect, or to the mere rivalry and contention of private interests.

When further we thought how he who was the central object of that vast gathering, was there not merely as an ordinary worshipper, but as one who had, by a marvellous recovery returned from the very valley of the shadow of death—and that, by a singular coincidence, the Primate's words of sober and simple counsel were uttered by one who had himself been recalled by a recovery not less wonderful to health and activity amongst us—a dying man, speaking as to a dying man of the duties of the living to which both had been alike brought back —when we remember how around that youthful form life and death had battled, for long days and nights, like mortal combatants, in a strife of which the whole English race were the awe-struck spectators—when we glanced at the mother, wife, brothers, sisters, and little children, in whose anguish, and anxious expectation, and returning happiness all the nation found the impersonation of their own peculiar joys and sorrows—then, again, we felt that it was not merely a solemn service, a sacred act of adoration, but a service, a worship, of the most living reality—because it rose from and gathered round a living human being, with passions, hopes, fears, duties, such as each one of us knows in himself, needing the same strength from above, struggling with the same terrible temptations, wrought in the same English mould, inheritor of the same individual destiny for weal or woe, according to the deeds done in the body, whether they be good or whether they be evil. Other services might be more ornate, more dramatic; other appeals to the feelings more exciting; other forms of devotion more eager to pry into the secrets of the eternal world, or explain the unrevealed mysteries of Providence. We were content with the simple expression of heartfelt gratitude, as of sons to a Father, for a mercy received,—and if that natural expression rose to gigantic proportions, it was only because the whole nation was resolved to bear its part therein.

But yet more; not only was this a solemn religious festival—not only did it concern the welfare of a human soul, which, whether of Prince or peasant, is equally precious in the sight of the Eternal God—but it was the response in every English heart to the sense of the union, too subtle for analysis, yet true and simple as the primitive instincts of our race—which binds the people of England to their monarchy, and the monarchy to the people. It is the feeling of which the Psalms are so noble a rendering, and which make them so fit an exponent of our national hopes and fears.—'There is the seat of judgment. There are the 'thrones of the house of David. For my brethren 'and companions' sake, I will wish thee prosperity;

'yea, because of the House of the Lord our God, 'I will seek to do thee good.' So spoke the Psalmist in the inspired thanksgiving, from which the text is taken. And so in a yet more exalted strain, another Psalmist drew a picture of what such a monarchy should be —'Give thy 'judgments, O God, to the king, and thy right- 'eousness to the king's son. He shall judge thy 'people with righteousness, and thy poor with 'judgment. He shall deliver the needy when 'he crieth, and the poor also, and him that hath 'no helper. In his days shall the righteous 'flourish, and abundance of peace, so long as the 'moon endureth.'

Such was the ideal of a just and beneficent Monarchy more than two thousand years ago. Such, to all who can feel or think, it still is, amidst whatever mixture of personal and national infirmity, amidst whatever changes have been wrought by differences of time and race and country, in our modern existence.

Look for a moment at the serious philosophic, Christian aspect of such a monarchy, as that which alone rendered possible the feelings of the week that is past. It is the one name and place amongst us which unites in almost unbroken succession the whole range of our island story, which is the common property of the whole British people, we might almost say of the whole Anglo-Saxon race. No other existing throne in Europe reaches back to the same antiquity, none other combines with such an undivided charm the associations of the past, the interests of the present. It is the one name and place, which, being raised high above all party struggles, all local jealousies, over all causes and over all cases, ecclesiastical as well as civil, is the supreme controlling spring which binds together, in their widest sense, all the forces of the State and all the forces of the Church. It is the one name and place which, being beyond the reach of personal ambition, beyond the need of private gain, has the inestimable chance, of guiding, moulding, elevating, the tastes, the customs, the morals of the whole community. It is the one institution, which, by the very nature of its existence, unites the abstract idea of country and of duty with the personal endearments of family life, of domestic love, of individual character. This is the bright side of that ancient and august possession, which has steadied the course of our onward progress, and given us peace in the midst of tumults, and freedom in the midst of order. It is because of the greatness of this possession, that we so fervently pray and hope that he who is its destined heir shall be worthy of his noble inheritance. He knows, and we know, that on him henceforth, as by a new consecration and confirmation, devolves the glorious task of devoting to his country's service that life which is in a special sense no longer his but ours, for which his country's prayers, his country's thanksgivings have been so earnestly offered. He knows, as few in like positions have known, the mighty power for good which has, within our own memory, been exercised in that lofty sphere by one who, from early manhood to his sudden and untimely end, wore 'the white

'flower of a blameless life,' unscathed and unspotted even in that 'fierce light which beats 'upon a throne.' He has learned by the experience of these eventful weeks, he has had borne in upon him by thousands and tens of thousands of voices, that 'of him to whom much has been 'given, of him shall much be required.' Hardly ever, in the long course of our history, has so heart-stirring a prospect been opened, of beginning life afresh, of taking the lead in all that is true and holy, just and good, of finding in the hundred calls of duty a hundred openings for the best and purest enjoyment, of strengthening the relaxed fibre (if so be) of English morals, of raising and purifying the homes of the poor and the tone of every grade of English society, of becoming by the sheer force of a stainless and guileless life a terror, not to good works, but to the evil.

Over the tomb of a famous Prince, who lies buried in this Abbey, and whose first entrance on a new career of goodness and usefulness began from the moment when he stood by his father's deathbed within these precincts, there is carved the flaming beacon or cresset light, which, says the ancient chronicler, 'he took for his badge, 'showing thereby that as his virtues and good 'parts had been formerly obscured, and lay as 'a dead coal waiting light to kindle it, . . . 'notwithstanding he being now come to his 'perfecter years and riper understanding, . . . 'his virtues should now shine forth as the light 'of a cresset, which is no ordinary light.' Such a kindling of such a beacon light, which shall reach as far as the fame of this Thanksgiving has penetrated—such may God grant to him whom the nation hopes by its prayers to have won back to itself for ever. 'Give, O give thy 'servant wisdom and knowledge, that he may 'go out and come in before this people . . . that 'is so great.' 'The Lord preserve his going out 'and his coming in, from this time forth for 'evermore.'

But if this be what we expect from the Throne, let us ask ourselves what the Monarchy, what the Empire, what the world expects from us. It is the glory of England that if the welfare of the Prince is the welfare of the people, not less is the well-being of the people the only safeguard of the well-being of the Prince. It is not with us, as in some Eastern or despotic states, where the Royal House dwells apart, withdrawn from all the surrounding influences of the country or the age in which their lot is cast. The breath of public opinion, of good or evil example, in our mixed and varied society, rises upwards as much as it descends downwards.

It is in our power, in the power of the people of England, to drag down the Throne, even in spite of itself, to the level, if so be, of our own meanness, triviality, or self-indulgence, as it is, thank God, also in our power, by the purity of our homes, by the sincerity and the loftiness of our purposes, to create the atmosphere in which the Throne must become pure and lofty, because it cannot help receiving the influences which ascend to it from below and from around. We, by raising up a constant succession of just, upright, loyal, single-minded citizens, of enlightened and energetic teachers, of far-seeing and unselfish statesmen, form a body-guard around the Royal House of England, even as the statues and monuments of famous Englishmen in this Abbey stand like a guard of honour round the shrines which contain the dust of our Princes and our Kings. Any breach in that sacred line of honest English hearts, any failure of duty, of vigilance, or of faithfulness on our part lays open the way for the destroyer to come in and lay waste the innermost sanctuary of the State itself. Our prayers, our thanksgivings, if they are to last beyond the passing moment, must take the shape, not of idle flattery or fond endearments, but of stern requirements of duty both from others and from ourselves.

We justly look down with mingled indignation and contempt on the miserable outrage against the Gracious Majesty of these realms. We are accustomed to regard with scorn the handful of misguided men, who seek to win popular favour by appeals to the prejudices, the passions, and the ignorance of the people. But let us remember that these are not the only or the chief dangers against which the Nation is bound to protect the Throne. If there be, as there have been in other times and in other countries, those who, hovering round the footsteps of the great, either for their own selfish ends, or from mere weakness and complaisance, or from mere vanity of vanities, strive to serve them by smoothing the path to sin, by making a mock at goodness, by hiding the unwelcome truth, or repeating the welcome falsehood—if there be any who, under the guise of friends, play the part of tempter and evil counsellor, who lie in wait for every occasion to flatter, to indulge, and to corrupt —if there be any such anywhere, these, far more than wild fanatics or the feeble parasites of the multitude, these are the real traitors, the real enemies of Sovereign, Prince, and people all alike.

It is for the growth of such as these that we,

the nation of England, are, in great measure, responsible before God and man. They are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. It is by our levity, if so be, that characters such as these are encouraged in their wretched folly, as it is by our firmness that they are discouraged and cowed. They come out when the moral atmosphere has been made dark around them, 'wherein 'all the beasts of the forest creep forth for their 'prey.' But 'when the sun ariseth,' when the bright burning light of a sound public opinion is brought to bear upon them, 'they get them-'selves together and lay them down again in 'their dens.'

On these then, and such as these, whosoever they be, men or women, high or low, the Day of Thanksgiving is or ought to be a Day of Doom. Against these, and such as these, the nation is called upon to echo the voice of most just judgment that goes up from every honest heart. On these, if on any human being whatever, Christian society, English society, ought to place its deliberate ban, its unmistakeable mark of righteous indignation. Whatever may have been before, yet now, if after the experience of these never-to-be-forgotten weeks and days—if, after this solemn recognition of the value of our great institutions, of the incalculable importance of the character of our rulers—if, after this, the nation relaxes its hold on the high vocation, which has thus been marked out, our last state shall indeed be worse than our first. If, after this, any such as I have described, shall be found, betraying, misleading, ensnaring those whom by every call, human and divine, they are bound to lead into all good and keep from all evil, such, if there be any such, deserve the contempt of man and the vengeance of GOD, as amongst the meanest, or the weakest, or the most detestable of mankind.

There is yet one more topic on which I would dwell. In those ancient days of the Jewish monarchy and Jewish people to which the text belongs, it was customary, on solemn occasions when, as we read, 'the King and the people 'made a covenant with each other and with 'God,' to erect some monument, some towering pillar, some massive altar, as a permanent witness to themselves and to the world, in order that they and all might for ever be reminded of what they had pledged themselves to do. It was a just and natural safeguard. Human emotions are so transitory that they need some such external monument or form in which they may be consolidated and fixed. Such a monument we are asked now to erect—most suitable to the occasion, most lasting in duration, most significant to the eye and the mind of England for all future time.

It is the restoration, the completion of the great metropolitan Cathedral of St. Paul, that witnessed the solemn service which we here this day, in the sister Abbey of St. Peter, have also met, in our humbler measure, to commemorate. It is in accordance with the varying characteristics of these two venerable and majestic Churches, that, whilst the Abbey of Westminster is interwoven by a gradual, silent, continuous chain, as by 'the links of natural piety,' with the even tenor, the stately pageants, the silent departures of our country's rulers and heroes, St. Paul's Cathedral derives its historical interest from single stirring incidents,—from the sudden and terrible vicissitudes of its own rise and fall, from the thunders of the Reformation at its pulpit cross. It has received the burst of national exultation at the destruction of the Armada, the victories of Blenheim and of Trafalgar. It has mourned with a mourning people over the graves of Nelson and Wellington—

> Who is this that cometh like an honoured guest,
> With a nation weeping, and breaking on my rest?—
> Mighty seaman, this was he, great by land as thou by sea.

It has rejoiced with the universal rejoicing at the unexpected recovery of an aged Sovereign at the close of the century that is past. It has now rejoiced, yet again, with the still wider joy, over the yet more wonderful restoration of the youthful Prince. In the circles of that same dome, round those same wide-embracing walls, that witnessed the covenant, as it may well be called, between the Heir of the Throne and his future people, shall now be carried on that glorious work which the mighty architect of the Cathedral was compelled to leave unfinished, which its most venerable historian and illustrious divine laboured in vain to accomplish, but which, when completed, shall make the great Protestant Cathedral of England worthy to look in the face the great Roman Basilica, of which it is even now a noble rival,—worthy also of the magnificent future which more and more seems opening before it, as the centre of instruction and edification to the thousands of worshippers, week by week, assembled within its almost illimitable space.

For such a completion as this the greatness of the Imperial Thanksgiving demands the united help of the British Empire. For such a completion as this, let every Englishman give, far and near, according to his means. Let none think they can give too much, let none think their contributions too insignificant, to commemorate a day in which they have all taken part—towards a great work, a world-renowned edifice, which ought to have been finished long ago, which, so long as a National Church exists amongst us, every Englishman may call his own, from the Queen in her palace down to the humblest peasant or the most remote Nonconformist, throughout the length and breadth of the land.

And when, in after days, Prince and people alike shall gaze with admiration on its vast interior, bright with all the splendours which art and wealth can bestow, as even now they look from far on those sublime proportions which rise above all the smoke and stir of this bewildering multitudinous city—may he and we be ever reminded of the solemn thoughts which have now filled our hearts—may he and we be always able to look back upon this week with thankfulness and not with shame—may he and we then behold in that august edifice a standing memorial of good resolutions, not broken but accomplished,—of noble hopes, not disappointed but fulfilled, of splendid opportunities, not lost but cherished to the utmost,—of generous devotion, on our part, to our Queen and country, not wasted in party strife but spent in the common good,—of love for God's holy Name, not shown in futile and fierce disputes about trifles but in the great causes of justice, charity, and truth. May we all be able to say ten, twenty years hence, with as much sincerity as now, 'I was 'glad when they said unto me, Let us go into 'the house of the Lord.'

LONDON: PRINTED BY
SPOTTISWOODE AND CO., NEW-STREET SQUARE
AND PARLIAMENT STREET